Deliver the best employee experience wherever remote workers are located.

Today’s workforces are more dispersed, yet more connected, than ever before. Globalization, the rising gig economy and the COVID-19 pandemic have shown that companies can move quickly to enable their employees to communicate, collaborate and stay productive independent of physical location.

Research conducted by Harvard Business Review Analytic Services reveals that remote workforces, and the need for the right digital workplace tools and capabilities, will only continue to grow. Done right, these digital tools and capabilities can positively impact organizations.

Be a leader in the digital workplace.

Fifty-seven percent of business leaders believe employees will work remotely 25% or more of the time after the pandemic.¹

Sixty-one percent of business leaders reported that the quality of remote work has been on par with that done in the physical workplace.²

Fifty-two percent of business leaders experienced improved collaboration.³

Forty-four percent reported an increase in productivity.³

More than one out of two business leaders believe that remote work has proven to be effective.¹

Remote work results in the same productivity levels or higher. Digital workplace investments can help produce positive returns.

Fifty-seven percent said digital capabilities boosted their agility.⁴

Sixty-two percent of business leaders were well prepared for virtual operations through remote communications and collaboration tools.⁵

Leading organizations work smarter, not harder.

A well-defined digital workplace strategy is vital.

Digital workplace investments can help produce a positive return.
